JOHN PHILLIP, who is best known to us perhaps by the distinguishing epithet of Spanish Phillip, was a Scotchman by birth and parentage, having been born at 13, Skene Square, Aberdeen,1 on April 19, 1817. His parents belonged to the same humble, hard-working class as those of David Roberts, and like that painter also, he began his art career as a house-painter. Unfortunately he has not left us, like Roberts, any pleasant autobiographical records. He seems indeed to have had a dislike to writing about himself, and scarcely wrote a letter unless it was absolutely necessary. It is difficult, therefore, to gain any exact information about his early life. It seems certain, however, that his taste for art was declared from childhood, and that, in the manner of so many youthful artists, he began to draw as soon as he could do anything. Phillip himself in laterdays was fond of relating how a drum belonging to his father, which used to hang on the wall at the foot of his bed, and that had the Royal arms painted ki brilliant colours upon it, greatly attracted his youthful attention, and was probably the first object that awoke in him a desire towards painting. His first employment seems to have been as errand-boy to a tinsmith in Hutcheon Street, and here his natural bent was seen by the delight he took in using the bright red and green paints wherewith his master coloured his pails and watering-cans. While thus employed he got acquainted with a local portrait-painter named William Mercer, who taught him some of the secrets of his art, but who was not best pleased, it is said, when he found his young pupil was likely to outstrip him. As a promotion from his
